

Getting More Detailed...

This week, I decided to make my weekly research report about theatrical architecture. Theatre is a passion of mine in addition to architecture. I thought it would be a good idea to research how architecture influences and impacts architecture and vice versa.

While doing research, I discovered that the architecture of theatres is changing over the years. The articles themselves were very different than other articles I have read. They had pictures, colour, and were set up in a different way than other articles; it had less of an essay type format. Learning how to navigate these articles was new for me. I had to find the information I needed in the new formatting of the articles.

Then, from the information of the articles, I had to write the research report. Taking that information, I struggled to find a good hook and introduction for the report. Several times, I wrote and rewrote the first paragraph to get the information flowing freely from my brain. Writing the report about the more specific topic of theatrical architecture, it was difficult to get the information to flow the same way as it had in previous reports. The topic was less broad, so I found it a bit more difficult to stretch the specific information into the essay.