

Progress and Patience

This week I had my first mentor visit. I met with Mr. Eric Horstman at the Corgan office in downtown Dallas where he introduced me to a few of his colleagues. He gave me advice for going into college to be an architect and what it is like working in the field. He also gave me advice and suggestions for my original work.

He talked about making my original work more conceptual and theoretical than pragmatic, especially since I do not know all of the nuts and bolts of architecture yet. He also suggested that instead of making a house, I should design a dream resort for my client. My original client has not at this point responded to me with what she would like for her dream resort, so I may have to find another client to work with.

Going forward, I will have to work on working with my client and really pushing them for the answers I need, because I do not have time to wait on them to ponder the questions of life while watching the Cowboys game and not responding to me. I will reach out again sometime today or tomorrow so that I can get the response I need to start my work. I have already missed one deadline.
