

School Security

This past week on my mentor visit I met with Mr. Brett Sumrow at the Corgan Frisco office. He, like Mr. Horstman, is also in the education department in the company.

He talked mostly about questions he gets when presenting a plan to a client. Often, they are safety questions. A few examples were “where do the students go when there is a tornado” and “Where do the students go if there is an active shooter?” Unsurprisingly, a lot of the questions and concerns were security and safety based.

Mr. Sumrow also discussed with me how schools are funded in different states, which was something I had not thought about. It was very interesting to learn about, however, because it is very relevant in the job. After all, isn't getting paid part of the reason we all have jobs?

When I talked to Mr. Sumrow this week, we discussed several interesting things. I think that a lot of what we discussed will be vital information for my original work. Including a school in the work will be of great importance because of the nature of the project. I would love to design a revitalised city centre for a US city that has low education rates and high poverty rates. Attracting new business growth and encouraging education will be the greatest aspects of my final product.
